State department mechanics broke down eight years ago when the late Secretary John Foster Dulles became a one-man department, Democratic Congressional Candidate James G. Kellis contends.

"Both the policy and area staffs in the department were stripped of their responsibility," Kellis, ex-Air Force colonel, said. "Dulles alone initiated all policy and often carried out certain aspects of it.

"This load of responsibility was obviously beyond the capacity of one individual and the consequence was a policy of reaction to Soviet initiative."
